Do social networking sites increase voter turnout among youths?

Introduction

Many see a possible care for the decline in political participation among youths in social networking sites (SNS). The potential for youth to vote in social networking sites, given the potential for greater political participation among youths in social networking sites, is an area of interest. Research has shown that SNSs are a potential tool for increasing political participation among youths. However, there is a lack of research on how SNSs can be used to increase political participation among youths.

We contend, on the other hand, that the connection between SNSs and political participation is untested by hard research. While it is impossible to determine the exact potential in SNSs, we believe that the continued popularity and wide use of Facebook and Twitter, combined with their potential to attract new young voters, make this connection easy to make.
